THE Book Agent opened the door, walked in, as used the Man in the office, drew up a chair, and lighted a cigar, all by himself. The Man in the office had only grunted and was hard at work again. The Book Agent puffed away quietly at his cigar, looking around the office the while as if he were the office man bosom friend and had been used to walking into the office most of his life. Finally the Man in the office looked up and the Book Agent's repeated his salutation of: "Good morning."

"Hare yu?" grunted the man in the office.

"Oh, I can't complain at all. Business is good and I am never sick. But I didn't come to talk business, exactly. I thought I'd drop in to see how you liked that lass set of Browning' I sent you. It's a nice thing, in't it? I thought you'd like it. There isn't anything new in my line that you haven't got, I guessa, except an edition of 'English Dramatice of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries' in this style—" and he threw out a sample volume. "But I'm not going to ask you to look at it to-day, Just thought I'd come in for a moment."

The Man in the office looked intensely releved. He ventured to smile and even to make a remark to the effect that not every agent had so much consideration.

"Well," went on the Book Agent, "I never press a man. If I see he's busy I never disturb him. And when I do get at him, I sin the ben known as Yasait the Third, because there had been other Vasails. you that Herndon's is the most authentic work on the subject.'

Here the Book Agent relighted his cigar. The Man in the office did likewise.

"Nice thing, that 'Dramatista,' isn't it? Shall I take your order for it?" The Man in the office filled out the slip which the Book Agent handed to him and signed his name to it.
